Hello and welcome to the continuing saga of my work as a writer. After a year of being stalked by the queen, I was feeling pretty good about my latest book, Stationary Man. But then I started receiving awful reviews, many of them saying things like: 'This book is garbage!' You've got to admit, it stung a little. So I decided to think about what had gone wrong and discover my inner Jane Austen. My first step was to get myself a copy of The Right Sort, which is basically a self-help book by a lady named Elizabeth Gilbert who says she's been an Austen since she was nine. I know, whoopee! Then I realised that it would be quite fun to write a book based on Gilbert's ideas - I could get a hand in changing the wrong sort. Anyway, I have just finished my first draft of Stationary Man. My next step was to read Elizabeth Gilbert's The Signature of All Things. And my conclusion is that a large number of books I'd considered reading are rubbish (not that I'd considered reading too many!) Elizabeth Gilbert's book is fantastic, not just for the ideas it contains, but also because it's written in a really clear and engaging style. Anyway, I'd better stop shamelessly promoting my work. PS: Here's an interesting fact for you: my publisher, Gollancz, say that on average I should receive two orders a day for Stationary Man. But I've only received one. And all I've done is to post a link on my website. Is this another clue that I'm on the wrong sort? 05 November 2008 I haven't written a word in a very long time, so I thought I'd write about why I quit. There are lots of reasons for quitting a writing career. Some of them
