Can the average person really crack a password safe encrypted with a certain key/passphrase in a matter of minutes. The use of lithium salts in conjunction with the administration of an anticonvulsant medication presents a pharmaceutical problem in that the anticonvulsant may exhibit a decreased efficacy if the lithium salt is also present. This condition, commonly known as "polypharmacy", can occur even with the use of relatively low lithium levels. The present invention is directed to the use of lithium compounds in combination with a known anticonvulsant medication, such as phenytoin, to enhance the medication's anticonvulsant activity without exhibiting the adverse symptoms experienced when lithium salts are taken alone. Prior to the present invention, lithium salts have been used in combination with other drugs to promote their absorption from the gastrointestinal tract. Many of these drugs, such as aspirin, are known to cause severe gastrointestinal bleeding and related symptoms even when taken in low dose concentrations. It is this unwanted effect that has limited the usefulness of oral lithium treatment. Consequently, there has been a considerable interest in ingesting medications with lower blood lithium levels to facilitate the absorption of these medications while avoiding unwanted side effects. It is therefore an object of the present invention to develop a method for increasing the absorption of an anticonvulsant medication in the human body in such a manner as to alleviate the potentially debilitating side effects resulting from the use of oral lithium salts. Reporting of clinical trial participants by professional nursing as a means of increasing retention in an ADRC. Adults with Alzheimer's disease (AD) and related dementias are in a phase of life in which their ability to function is declining rapidly. They are often at risk for institutionalization, and they require complex services and nursing care. In this paper we describe the response of nurses to their requests for ADRC patient care and report their use of the National Data Bank, a national registry of information on all patients enrolled in AD research, to increase the retention of adult patients in research protocols. The National Data Bank provides valuable information on patients' participation in research protocols, laboratory data and clinical events, and is a unique tool for identifying data that can be used to support patient retention in research. In many mechanical devices, it is necessary to transfer power, or torque, from one rotating
