Enhancement of ion currents through Cx45 hemichannels and Panx1 channels. Pannexins (Panx1-3) are cysteine-rich channels permeable to cations, including inorganic phosphate, that are expressed in many cells. These channels have been suggested to be important for cell-to-cell communication, and in some cases have been found to be overexpressed in several pathological conditions. Two recent studies demonstrated that Panx1 channels are activated by mechanical stretching in patch-clamped rat embryonic cardiomyocytes and in HEK-293 cells expressing Cx45. They also showed that Panx1 channels open in the presence of ATP, and that ATP or ATP analogues may influence the function of Panx1 channels in transfected cell lines or in the heart. In other studies, Panx1 channels have been found to be activated by exposure to extracellular pH above 7.4, or by chemical suppression of a protease that degrades Panx1 channels when exposed to extracellular pH above 7.4. The basis of these observations is not known, but it has been hypothesized that Panx1 channels, activated by various stimuli, might be involved in the regulation of cell volume or in the release of ATP during cellular injury. In this study, we show that a similar enhancement of ion currents through Panx1 channels by cell swelling or extracellular pH is observed in a Cx45 hemichannel-expressing cell line, when the hemichannel is activated by mechanical stretching. Under the same conditions, we show that Cx45 hemichannels are also activated by ATP, as well as by mechanical stretching. These results suggest that Cx45 and Panx1 channels are activated by mechanical stretching, or by exposure to extracellular pH above 7.4, and that these channels are therefore potential targets for the cell volume regulation and for metabolic damage that may follow cell injury.Q: How to select the child/child-children element of the current element in CSS?
