Here, you can take control of the two French & Irish infantries as you lead them against the German Army. Play through a full Campaign and win a number of military objectives like taking control of map sectors, and take part of the Battle of France against the enemy. Follow the national flag and assign your units to protect it: the closer to the enemy's flag the better for you! Collect resources to build new units: Steel, Rubber, Oxygen, Light Trench Mortar, Tanks, Mortars... Once per Campaign, the option to continue the game in Multiplayer mode will be available. In Multiplayer mode, you can join a private or public server hosted by friendly players. In Multiplayer mode, you will be able to use the Premium Weapon system. Your progress is synced automatically between all your devices (PC, smartphone & tablet). You can play on all your devices at the same time. INFANTRY WARGAMES, two beautiful infantries, join the war against the enemy! Battle for the sky! In WW1, the French and British infantries were the first line of the French and British military defences. Able to fight all the way from the Austro-Hungarian border to the North Sea, these units made a big impression. Diorama Builder Soundtrack is a science fiction-themed 16-bit video game developed by Nintendo for the Game Boy and released in 1990. The soundtrack for the game was released in 1991, and was provided by Alex Nüchter, who performed it using GM Sound Designer hardware. He is the first video game musician to use a synthesizer outside of a game's soundtrack, and was invited to compose the soundtrack for Nintendo's Legend of Zelda: Link's Awakening. Diorama Builder Soundtrack was directed by Miles Silcock and produced by Ronen Sarig and Jaron Lanier. Diorama Builder Soundtrack features twelve memorable music tracks from a non-human perspective and several completely non-existent music tracks for puzzle-like gameplay situations. Nintendo marketed this as the first electronic-music game for the Game Boy. The game contains four hidden audio tracks, which can be heard after the game is saved. The graphics of the game were created using LithTech Software, which utilized the Game Boy's custom sound hardware, and it was the first video game for the console to have characters drawn using a digitizing pen. The gameplay, which involves constructing and placing a robot on a fictional planet, uses one of the first models of the Game Boy to run and it received positive reviews. GameSpot described it as a "truly outstanding experience", and reviewers often cited it as an inspiration for new rhythmic games, although some critics were displeased with the lack of songs for gameplay situations and the game's difficulty curve. Several music tracks have been used by other video games, and some of them were used again in one of Nintendo's earliest Game Boy games, Super Mario Land 2: 6 Golden Coins. Gameplay In Diorama Builder Soundtrack, the player's objective is to build three robots and place them on a fictional planet created by the game's public access channel, Planet K-Bob. The robots are bipedal and use four legs to walk on the planet and fire lasers out of their eyes. The robots also carry food, and the player is required to supply a particular amount of food for the robots. A difficulty setting decides the amount of points the player receives at the end of every robot build, and players are separated into three difficulty levels, based on the number of points. The object is to build the highest-scoring robot, but the players may have limited resources to create new legs, laser rifles, a robot enclosure, and extra-large robot heads. At first

Field of the Invention This invention relates to the field of supporting pads for horses and specifically to a type of pad which can be quickly and easily applied with minimal time and materials. B. Description of the Prior Art When a horse is standing in a stable or corral, the major portion of its weight is supported by the ground or other supporting surface. This weight is carried by all four legs of the horse's body. Thus the legs are either in contact or nearly in contact with the supporting surface for the majority of the time the horse is standing in a stable or corral. As one can imagine, horses are uncomfortable when their legs are not in contact with the supporting surface. The horse is also uncomfortable when the supporting surface is not level and free from obstructions. It is generally necessary for horses, particularly stallions, to stand in the center of a supporting surface. For this reason, horse stalls are usually designed so that the supporting surface can be rotated in order to bring the stall to a centered position. Otherwise, the horse must be moved to bring the stall to a centered position when it first goes into the stall. In order to alleviate the above-mentioned problem, horses are sometimes custom fitted with a custom-made set of boots to limit their ability to move or change position on the supporting surface. This is usually done on the hoof and is usually called "booting". Boots are also widely used for temporary purposes, such as for animals or humans who do not want to step into a shoe. The use of
