Twenty-two of these patients have now been followed-up after a median period of 49 (range 2-110) months. None of these patients has developed local or distant recurrences, whereas three have developed metastases (two lung, one liver). Histological examination of the resected specimens was performed by a separate pathologist. Tumour regression was moderate or poor in 15 patients. Moderate or poor tumour regression was associated with a significantly (P less than 0.05) lower probability of survival after 5 years than was seen in a group of patients with similar tumours and similar response to chemotherapy, but undergoing similar surgical treatment (eight of ten), but of more advanced T stage (P less than 0.01). Further follow-up will be required to fully document the natural history of this series of patients.
