The recently-unveiled iPhone 5 has the same strength and weighs the same as its iPhone 4 predecessor, but Apple says its back and battery are now 70% stronger than before. However, in a press release, the company did admit that the battery would need to be recharged more often, since it's running on a 30% larger battery than the iPhone 4. But by how much? Well, the iPhone 4 is rated at 1000 mAh, while the new 5 has a battery capacity of 1500 mAh. According to Apple, that has allowed it to reduce the number of amps needed to charge the battery by 29% — 21 watts compared to the 15 watts needed to charge the iPhone 4. However, that's not to say the iPhone 5's battery is actually 30% bigger than its predecessor. The company says it is just 30% larger at the battery side of things, which amounts to roughly 300 mAh. Apple also says it has improved how long the iPhone 5's battery will last between charges. Previously, the iPhone 4 only lasted about 15 hours between recharges, while the iPhone 5 can last almost 20 hours. The company's also touted the camera, which now has a higher resolution of up to 8 megapixels (the iPhone 4 offers 5 megapixels). The ABC/BBC of CIDR: The song remains the same Tools Bella Orchestra The new Bella Orchestra seems the perfect thing for the current moment — in school, in the office, at the club, maybe even at home. In all cases, it is meant to be background music to get up and going. It's a fast "whatever," as we approach the moment when the boss will say, "Hi, I'm looking for." So we go about our business, putting together our thoughts, waiting for the next interruption from that most important person who will soon ask us something. Bella Orchestra is part of a CD (Sounds of Joplin) by a local pianist, Ben Kelley, who has been playing the rags and ballads of his home town since age 7. He's also played with both the St. Louis Symphony and the St. Louis Pops, and now
