Phylogeography and population demography of Richardson's ground squirrel (Spermophilus richardsonii) inferred from the mitochondrial DNA control region. * In this study, we employ a combination of mitochondrial DNA (mtDNA) control region sequences and microsatellite DNA to characterize phylogeographic patterns in the white-tailed deer mouse (Peromyscus maniculatus) and Richardson's ground squirrel (Spermophilus richardsonii). The two species are potentially syntopic in parts of California's Sierra Nevada range and are likely to exchange faunal and floral resources. * For both species, we sampled mtDNA sequences from 62 individuals from across their distribution in California and Alaska. Microsatellite alleles were also characterized for a subset of these samples from both regions. * Data from these three data types were integrated to evaluate the overall range of biogeographic history that has governed these species. We also inferred past population size changes and population extinction/extirpation using a coalescent-based procedure. * We found strong indications of recent expansion in both species. In addition, the data suggest that the primary expansion of Richardson's ground squirrel occurred in the northern part of the species' range, following the phase of glaciation in the Northwest. This is one of the first studies to infer significant population size changes on a continuous basis for a North American squirrel. * Excess mtDNA diversity in some populations is likely the result of secondary contact of populations through the formation of allopatric refugia following postglacial expansion. On the basis of the unusual haplotypic structure of some populations, we speculate that several relatively rare haplotypes may be considered to be relatively more specialized. * Analysis of microsatellite loci also detected very recent gene flow from white-tailed deer mice into Richardson's ground squirrels. Inferred levels of gene flow indicated that the two species are potentially syntopic

Mutations of the dystrophin gene and the concomitant progressive muscle weakness is the most frequent genetic lesion associated with Duchenne muscular dystrophy (DMD). The C. elegans model has provided powerful experimental tools, but has failed to identify a nematode homologue of the dystrophin gene. Several C. elegans homologues of vertebrate dystroglycan have been cloned and these proteins do not appear to be implicated in muscle function. We have completed a cDNA library screening from a C. elegans whole body cDNA library for dystrophin-like gene products. We have identified six C. elegans homologues of dystrophin: DYNGRA, DYNGRB, DYNGRC, DYNGRD, DYNGRE, and DYNGRV. Two of the cDNAs were independently identified by two different labs. The six C. elegans dystrophin homologues share approximately 30% sequence identity with each other and 45% with the corresponding vertebrate homologues, while exhibiting a 30% sequence identity among each other. By sequence similarity, we propose that the C. elegans proteins are orthologues of the vertebrate dystrophins. We propose to test the following three hypotheses regarding the role of dystrophin in muscle integrity in the C. elegans: (1) The three cysteine-rich (CR) domains of the
