The energy-dependence of cell-free protein synthesis was studied in reactions using either endogenous triphosphate nucleotides or added dATP, dTTP and dGTP. In reactions with endogenous triphosphates, all of the twenty amino acids examined were synthesized, but synthesis of specific substrates was dependent on concentration and/or energy availability. When exogenous triphosphates were added, synthesis was observed in all cases except those involving translation of the 40S ribosomal subunit. In such reactions, larger amounts of exogenous triphosphates were required to support substantial synthesis of 40S than 60S subunits. In addition, specific substrates for either 60S or 40S subunits, and a specific substrate for 70S subunits, were not synthesized in reactions supplemented with exogenous triphosphates. We propose that the latter results are due to the lack of a functioning ribosomal RNA gene copy. While the addition of exogenous triphosphates allowed synthesis of specific proteins, it was not possible to select for specific proteins in reactions supplemented with dATP, dTTP and dGTP, suggesting a stringent requirement for dTTP in the reactions studied.Frank Osborn (cricketer) Frank Benjamin Osborn (19 October 1886 – 13 March 1947) was an English cricketer. Osborn was a right-handed batsman who fielded as a wicket-keeper. He was born in Calne, Wiltshire and educated at Radley College. He made his first-class debut for Gloucestershire against the New Zealanders in 1913. During the season he represented the county in 8 first-class matches, the last of which came against Somerset in 1920. In his 8 first-class matches, he scored 124 runs at an average of 12.37, with a high score of 31 not out. Osborn also made his debut for Devon in the 1920 Minor Counties Championship against Hertfordshire. He played Minor counties cricket for Devon between 1920 and 1924, making a total of 18 Minor Counties Championship appearances. He died at Utopia,
