The company, which is reportedly hard at work on its own blockchain platform, has just started a private beta of a new service it calls Instagram Connect, designed to enable developers to use the API for their own standalone apps and products. How can Facebook make money from its growing user base? 1. Develop a better social graph After scanning billions of Facebook profiles, it's likely that Mark Zuckerberg knows more about who you know than anyone else. A new set of ad rules Facebook already generates a huge amount of profit from selling ads, but the company is looking to double down. It has said it plans to raise revenue from online ads by up to $2 billion annually by 2020. 3. Connect to the real world In November, Facebook launched a drone to test ways to improve aerial delivery. It also revealed a partnership with UPS to send packages via drones. In the long-term, it is looking to develop ways to package data, as part of its ongoing mission to make use of the data it collects about people. 4. Bring messaging in-line with the real world Facebook Messenger is already a staple of many smartphone users' lives, but will it retain its position as the number one messaging app when people start to leave Facebook behind? Not if its new competitors can help it. 5. An expanded business After launching as an app that allows people to communicate with friends for free, Facebook has shifted gears and is expanding its reach into areas where it can charge for services, such as enhancing the Friend Finder feature that helps find people on Facebook. 6. Venture out with "Buy" buttons Facebook's long-rumored mobile payments service, which may never come to fruition, has occasionally been mentioned as a possible source of revenue for users who aren't attached to the social network. Its Oculus VR headset, a device that allows you to view images and videos
