The original algorithm, introduced in the 1960s by Glen Mathy in a time-sharing system, works as follows: The clock is advanced once every day in a clock register at a fractional second rate. At any instant, the number of seconds in the past represented by the value in the clock register is the total number of seconds in the 24 hours since midnight. That is, if there are, seconds in the 24 hours since midnight, then the 24 hours counter is incremented by. When there are seconds in the 24 hours since midnight, the clock register is set to the point at which the 24 hours counter (or ) would reach the current time. The clock register will never exceed. The basic rate for the clock register is 1/4800 of a second. This allows the clock register to quickly increment a clock once per day. An alternative is to use the fractional second rate of the clock, 1/86400.

This is accurate for all purposes since counting intervals using the 48-hour clock is exactly accurate. The fractional second method is preferred, as even the second method is not always exact. It fails if you are on a 24-hour system, or if the clock has been preset to something other than midnight, and has not yet been reset to midnight. This happens if the clock is made up from a real clock and a trigger. Due to the 6d1f23a050
